A Closer Look

FULBRIGHT SCHOLAR BRINGS STUDENTS A NEW VIEW

Students in Dr. Greg Fowler's American literature and American studies classes at Penn State Erie, The Behrend College, are getting a more global view of America from their professor, a Fulbright Scholar who recently returned from a year of teaching at the John F. Kennedy Institute for North American Studies at the Free University in Berlin.

"Living in Berlin for a year gave me a real appreciation for the generational differences the German people are facing," said Fowler. In addition to teaching for two semesters, Fowler gave lectures, training seminars and conference presentations throughout Germany on behalf of the American Embassy and the German-American Institutes.

German higher education is much different than American colleges and universities, Fowler reports. In Germany, university courses are free, and students are not required to register. They attend classes, take the exams and receive a Schein, or certificate, indicating successful completion of the course. After presenting the appropriate number of Schein to the university, students receive a degree.

In addition to teaching, Fowler served as a member of the Fulbright commission's selection board, which selects German student-scholars to travel to the United States. He also persuaded faculty at Penn State's University Park Campus to take part in the Fulbright commission's Teacher Exchange Linkage Program, which invited German teachers here to learn more about American language and culture. In addition, Fowler published three scholarly articles during his year abroad.
