Mike Sharkey's Tip of the Week

By Mike Sharkey

With students and faculty scrambling to class in the morning, or scrambling to leave the campus at the end of the day, or even scrambling to get lunch in the afternoon, pedestrians find themselves in mortal peril when attempting to cross the many roads that cut through Behrend's campus.

A single guy almost feels like he is playing Frogger when trying to cross over from the Erie lot over to Reed, or crossing Jordan Road. Commuters are in too much of a hurry to care for the welfare of their fellow students, and only in extraordinary circumstances will a driver actually yield and let a pedestrian cross the road. In order to avoid the embarrassing situation of being stuck on the corner, waiting for traffic to subside, I offer several tips that could help:

-Make sure you leave early enough to avoid the last-minute rush when classes start and end. If you get to the parking lot at an odd hour, such as 9:35a.m. instead of 9:50a.m. (when classes start at 10am). Odds are, there will be less traffic either coming or going, and crossing will be easier then.

-Wait for an attractive male or female to attempt a crossing first, then TAILGATE THEM!

-There are strengths in numbers. If you see a group of students, follow them. It's likely that you will be able to cross with them.

Do not attempt to cross without looking. I am surprised how some students will cross with their heads down, talking on their cell phones, expecting their hurried and tardy peers to slow down and stop for them. Luckily for those on cell phones, they are usually attractive, so the second tip applies to them... luckily.
