Weather Los Angeles is better than Erie

by Jerome Pohl
L.A. Correspondent

Bryce tells me that you guys got blizzardkrieged recently, so I wrote back to gloat. Snow: we don't have it in Los Angeles, we're not going to get it, and thanks to modern marvels (like global warming) we never will. So while you poor studeiceles are Walken in a winter wonderland, I'm working on my tan, for free, on a beach. Just so we're clear, beaches are where the land meets the ocean; enjoy your lake and the snow it affects.

Instead of seeing my breath when I breathe, I get to watch the particulates swirl into each other and back into my lungs. So while I'm evolving to adapt to the smog, you guys are still one step behind birds, who have the good sense to fly south for the winter. In addition to the pollution from cars and factories, the air is full of the nearby flaming mountains. Unlike cold, wet Erie, Los Angeles is so hot and dry that we have entire mountains on fire.

Instead of the four seasons in Erie (Almost Winter, Winter, Still Winter, and Road Construction), Los Angeles has Summer, Fire season, and Flood season. Road construction is constant here, so it's not considered a season all its own. It's so refreshing out here that snow does not hinder our driving. Our roads are only plagued by the fact that everybody is tailgating at 100 mph (when we're not parked in gridlock). Merging onto the freeway here gives me more of a sense of accomplishment than four years at Penn State. I am worried that people will judge me for using my turn signal, though.

Instead of coats and boots, my closet is full of clothes to wear to clubs and all the other great places to go and things to do in L.A. I'll try not to miss sledding too much while I'm dancing with strippers at Club Facade.

Manhattan; six beads after rebate

Recent discoveries may prove that the first pilgrims to arrive in North America were not killed off by cold or hunger during their first winter in the New World. Instead, recent findings indicate that a wave of violence erupted in the colony, resulting in the death of the majority of the colonists.

The arrival of a rebate check postmarked roughly 385 years ago may indicate that the actual cause of the massive loss of life was in fact due to the violence and chaos caused by the first Black Friday in the colonial settlement.

The rebate check arrived last Thursday at the home of Mrs. Jane Bradford, a descendant of one of the original settlers. As with all rebate checks, this one took slightly longer than six to eight weeks to be processed. The rebate was made out to a Mr. George, written out as "One freshly killed rabbit for the purchase of one bushel of corn." The original receipt indicates that the purchase date of said corn was Friday, Mar. 23, 1621, which was one day after the signing of the peace treaty between the Pilgrims of Plymouth Colony and the Massasoit of the Wampanoags.

The term "Black Friday," in modern society, is attributed to the day that retail stores manage to sell enough to pay off the remainder of their debt for the year (debt being marked in red on the balance sheet), and finally enter "in the black," which indicates profit. With these recent discoveries, the name may have actually originated the day the pilgrims started a riot while waiting in line for the new rebate system initiated by the Wampanoags. In this case, "Black Friday" stands for a day of death and chaos, not unlike modern times. The chaotic barbarism exhibited by the colonists can be seen to this day with modern men and women bashing in faces, snapping necks, and gouging eyeballs while rushing for rebates and special deals offered by retailers. For some families, this day has become an annual tradition.

Recent archeological digs indicate that foul play and utter chaos erupted on the day the Wampanoags had their annual "Selling of Bad Harvest" sale, where the natives took all the food that had spoiled during the winter, and sold it to the unsuspecting Europeans. In that particular year, the natives introduced a rebate system to entice the colonists into buying more. The Wampanoags never had to fulfill the promised rebate, because the buyers would typically die of dysentery before the six weeks were over. Colonists that survived the six-week period were then forced to wait another two weeks while the Wampanoags "processed" the rebate, wherein the colonists then died from chronic impatience.

Mrs. Bradford was stated as saying, "Oh, I'm going to cash in the rebate, sure. I've hired a private investigator to track down the guy's family to make sure his descendants are all dead." Unfortunately for Mrs. Bradford, the native and his entire family who promised the rebate were all killed in 1622 by a small pox epidemic.

Lead found in Chinese-made condoms; Superman says "Huzzah!"

by Mike Sharkey

Toys and glue sticks aside, scientists have focused their studies of lead content in contraceptives that are manufactured in China, and have found that 84 percent of all condoms contain lethal doses of lead. The scientists involved with the study are hoping to eliminate this problem, which could lead to birth defects, and/or death. Dr. Gunther Hezmaaaa(sic), leading the team in both research and activism, has come up with a very cute slogan for the campaign: "Get de lead out (of her)!"

Besides the fact that buying condoms at Walmart is like having sex with a little Chinese man in the room, readers should also be aware that China produces over one billion condoms annually for multiple name brands sold throughout the world. So though you might think that buying your goods on Amazon.com, you may find yourself sorely mistaken.

Though most people would be concerned with these problems (for lead was one of the leading causes of the downfall of the Roman empire), but there are some among us who have been positively affected by the sudden increase in lead in our everyday products. Mr. Clark Kent, also known as (spoilers!) SUPERMAN, has just now breathed a sigh of relief, so he was reported to have done. When we asked him why he just blew the power lines over at Penn State Behrend on Tuesday, he replied with "Well! With lead in condoms, Lois and I can finally do it right!" Superman then flew/fled the scene, leaving teachers and students with no power, and the day off. A few hours later, slight tremors could be felt in Metropolis, but nothing substantial could be made of it.

When we finally found Superman again, he indeed seemed to look happier, reporting his full support of lead-based products. "The only trouble I've been having, and I would appreciate it if you didn't quote this in your newspaper, is that I can't see through women's bras anymore... Too much lead in em! I mean the condom thing I'm fine with, but how's a super hero supposed to get his fix when everyone's wearing lead underwear?!"

Hopefully Superman's words will impact our international corporations and government alike in eliminating China, and its tainted goods. Let's free boobs from bondage and cheap labor!

Other products from China reported to contain lead:

- Glue stick caps
- Lipstick
- Jello Jigglers
- Britney Spears
- Pencils
- Your grandma's teeth
- Chuck Norris
- Newspapers
- Tampons
- Nose rings
- Bruno's food
- The Earth
