

Apologies to Dr. Richards

Dr. Winston Richards

Last week, when the winner of the Jordan teaching award, who is Dr. James Knestrick, was announced a grave error was committed.

Dr. Winston Richards, one of those nominated for the honor, was not mentioned in the front-page article. We take this opportunity to correct that mistake and extend apologies to Dr. Richards for failing to list his name.

Others nominated, in addition to Knestrick and Richards were Dr. Donald Alexander, Dr. Robert Bresler, Mr. Wesley Houser, Dr. Thomas Knight, Mr. Anthony Lorenzi, Dr. John Markese and Dr. Floyd Maoan.

23 APRIL 73

I, a young and curious Sinclair;
You, a Demian who lit my way.
In ancient years, in realms so far away
You whispered truths—realities to share.
When absence settled in I walked the line
You oh, so vaguely hinted at before.
The evolution melted through my core
And brought me to the readiness of time.
My Demian, my friend, we're here again,
But age has brought me out from underneath
Your Tutelage—we share a common seat
Recharging energies within our brain.
For, Max, somewhere I knew within my mind
Our arcs would intersect another time.

P.S.U. Faculty work long hard hours

University Park, Pa.—Faculty members at Penn State work an average of 50.6 hours per week, according to an analysis published by the university's Dept. of Public Information. The survey required by Penn State's 1972-73 Appropriation Act, has been submitted to the Governor and the Appropriations and Education Committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

It describes aspects of the University's educational program including the number of courses taught, the number of full- and part-time faculty, and undergraduate and graduate enrollments. An analysis of how each faculty member utilized his workweek was also prepared.

The average full-time member paid from the University's resident instruction budget spent an average of 39.4 hours per week on instructional activities and an estimated 11.2 hours per week in other University assignments during last Fall's ten-week term.

Actual measurements showed that Penn State's faculty spent 12.3 hours weekly in the classroom, but that these hours are only the tip of the iceberg in terms of their total workloads. In addition to their classroom duties, the average faculty member spent an additional 27.1 hours each week in instructional supporting activities. These included preparing lectures, tests and reading lists, reviewing papers, grading examinations, advising students, and meeting with them individually for conferences.

In addition to instructional responsibilities, faculty put in an additional 11.2 hours in research, public service, and administrative or committee activities, boosting their total average workweek to the 50.6 hour figure.

Penn State collected data for the survey at each of its 22 campuses, exclusive of the Milton S. Hershey Medical Center. Complete figures were available from Summer and Fall Terms, 1972, while those for Winter and Spring, 1973, were based on projections.

The survey also reported the composite weekly workload of all full-time faculty, including those whose salaries were paid fully or in part from budget areas other than resident instruction.

To insure the accuracy of the survey data, the University conducted three checks.

First, results were compared with those from other institutions. Studies of faculty at comparable universities across the country show a similar workweek, the survey noted. For a University with a graduate instruction program and a long-standing mission of research, the workload figures also suggest that Penn State's faculty devotes more time to teaching than do those at many other schools.

Secondly, after each faculty member had completed the survey form, it was reviewed by the appropriate department head, college dean, and/or campus director.
