230 Diner

by
Fred Prouser

"Are you having coffee this morning?" has become a familiar greeting to many Capitol students who venture out into the night in search of a place to eat and find themselves at the 230 Diner.

The diner closes at ten p.m. and reopens for early morning breakfast at two a.m. Cars begin to arrive around one-thirty in the morning and their occupants wait for the 230 sign to light up and the diner lights to come on, the signal that the night shift is ready to serve the tired and sober, the sleepless, and those nursing their particular problem of the moment.

Interesting crowds of people seem to congregate at different times of the morning. Between two and three a.m., those who have been out bar hopping stop by for a bite to eat and some coffee, the universal antidote for a hangover. Bar Hoppers observed include not only Capitol students, but assorted local people in various states of inebriation.

After three a.m., a different crowd shuffles in. The hustle and bustle has died down. The bar hoppers have made their way home and are probably praying for the morning not to come. The people in the diner now tend to be sober for the most part and are able to converse with some sensibility. Nixon, Watergate and the Economy are subjects prone to lengthy discourse with total strangers at the counter. The power of a cup of coffee that stays perpetually full is remarkable. The insights gained under the influence of this drug, caffeine, are frightening. At times, this writer has been known to agree that on occasion President Nixon has done something worthwhile for the nation. What exactly that is, is not that clear. It must be remembered that these statements are oft times made under duress and under the influence. Perhaps the Diner uses 100% Columbian?

Victims of all-nighters, a predicament prevalent around the end of each term, can be found staring into their coffee cups muttering obscenities and expletives deleted, about the paper or lab report that is due in a few short hours.

A trip to the diner somehow helps to change the perspective for one who is pulling an all-nighter. It is comforting to know that others are depriving their bodies of sleep. The practical aspect is that it is easier to work on a full stomach, and if finances are tight, the 230 Diner is the place to go. An egg, toast and coffee will set you back fifty-five cents, while something more substantial like eggs, ham, home fries, toast and coffee will run just under two dollars.

As dawn overtakes the night, the diner starts to fill with those ending the night shift and those who will have to start work in a short while. Milkmen, truck drivers assorted regulars receive the same greeting, "Are you having coffee this morning?"

Stephanie's 230 Diner has come full circle during the night, and now prepares for the onslaught of the day people. The atmosphere of the diner changes; it is less intimate. Perhaps it is a matter of taste, but it IS a different type of person who goes out for breakfast at three in the morning.

Carly Simon, in her new album, HOT CAKES, describes the feeling perfectly in a lyric from MISFIT. "Not every man was born to stay up late at night." Capitol Campus students seem to have this need for a myriad of reasons. Let's hope the seniors can get up for commencement at eleven a.m. on June 8th.
