

Letters To The Editor

We received a letter recently from a disgruntled student who described himself as a journalist of brief and undistinguished experience. In his letter he offered us page upon page of criticism and suggestions concerning how the C. C. READER should be improved.

We would have gladly printed his correspondence, however he did not take the time and effort to type his comments. We at the READER do not have the time to sit down and retype such illegible copy. We have enough problems with our own.

So, dear disgruntled student, since you are so full of great ideas why not stop by the C.C. READER office and help us make the paper even better. After all, we need all the help we can get.

Getting Placed

by Lynn Kramer

Attention, Capitol Campus graduates holding degrees in Social Science or Humanities! This is common sense speaking to you. How's the employment scene been treating you lately? Rotten, huh?

Don't point the fickle finger of fate at your teachers or counselors and scream about poor counseling. Rather take a good look at yourself.

When on-campus recruiting time came around did you sit back on your gluteus maximus and wait until it disappeared slowly into the sunset of another day? Believe it or not this attitude among liberal arts students, (Humanities and Social Science are now generally classified as liberal arts by employers if you didn't know), at Capitol Campus has become an everyday fact of life.

Placing liberal arts candidates in job openings is tough but compounding the problem is the fact that you don't sign up for interviews. You hastily glance over the nature of the positions that are available and never consider what the training in that position might lead to. In other words: 'Look beyond that first job to where it can lead you'.

A first job as "Production

Supervisor Trainee", with knowledge and experience gained from it, could lead to positions in labor relations, employee relations, production management, or personnel.

Now you may be saying to yourself "Liberal arts graduates are not employable". Bullshit! Welfare rolls are not overloaded with liberal arts graduates so therefore they are employable.

From 1645 to 1865 the United States offered degrees only in liberal arts. During this time graduates were influential in every phase of our governmental and economic structure. They were prominent in our country's arts and sciences and even helped build factories, railroads, and bridges.

Here is an extract of a report by the College Placement Council. "From 1973 to 1974 social science and humanities graduates comprised only seven per cent of all jobs offered to graduates from all degree areas. Sixty three per cent of all jobs offered to Humanities-Social Science graduates combined were made to Social Scientists and all offers resulted from recruitment on campuses. The percentage of job offers to Humanities and Social Science graduates would increase remarkably if more of these graduates would take interviews".

So now common sense says "Do yourself a favor". The following suggestions can help speed up the job entry process. Deeply analyze all positions available to graduates with your kind of background. Don't overlook job training programs when establishing your more immediate objectives.

When on-campus recruiting time comes around TAKE INTERVIEWS!! How are your resumes? If you aren't quite sure how to prepare one follow some of the suggestions found in the Placement Manual which will become available to all seniors on or around October 15. If you plan to take an interview, register for placement soon. Obtain a copy of the next Newsletter put out by the Placement Center and follow the schedule for on-campus recruiting. Forms for placement registering are found in the Manual. It's a fact that employment will usually come about through individual effort.
