Faculty Workload Studied

Hempstead, N. Υ. (I.P.) Those who say that college and university faculty are overworked don't know what they are talking about. But then again, neither do those who say that professors do not work hard enough.

The plain truth, according to Dr. Harold Yuker, director of the Center for the Study of Higher Education at Hofstra University, is that nobody what knows faculty workload really is, although the schedule of teaching and administrative assignments obviously has something to do with it.

Dr. Yuker came to his conclusion after a study of hundreds of articles on faculty workload and productivity. "Many colleges and universities will lighten the schedule of an instructor teaching a graduate course," notes Dr. Yuker. "But graduate courses involve no more faculty time than undergraduate ones. The available literature indicates that the actual hours spent in the classroom, in preparing lessons and in evaluating student performance is the same regardless of the level of the course involved."

In like manner, a large class does not necessarily mean a greater investment of time by a teacher. More important factors are the type subject matter (mathematical vs. literary, for example) and the mode of presentation--(laboratory vs. lecture).

Most educators agree that faculty workload--which generally determines salary, promotion and tenure ---must take into account more than instructional hours alone. Scholarly research, improvement of professional expertise by
