point he is concentrating mostly on design and construction of the dark-room, and is not certain exactly how he will run the course as far as scheduling and grading are concerned.

He also described his course as an attempt to have students develop their own style, one that could be recognized by others.

It will not be a lecture course, but a course where the student produces his own work, recognizing the fact that photography is an on the building at that time. However, there were no corresponding changes made to the blueprints, South said.

Because of this, the present contractors have found some unexpected changes in the building layout, and the construction plans must be altered accordingly, according to South.

The object of the renovation is to convert an austere PX building into an activities center with a warm friendly atmosphere.

The work to be done will include lowering of the ceiling, paneling the walls, replacement of the lighting system and the installation of a sound system in the main room. The game room will be enlarged and the snack bar will be renovated.

The project is the culmination of the three years' work by the members of the Student Government.

aesthetic and artistic medium as well as a medium of social significance.

The student can approach the course from a photo-journalism angle or get into still-lives or landscape. His photographs should be good, have something to say, Thomas said, and also be interesting.

The final grade, Thomas said, will be based on the students' portfolio, although he has not set a definitive number of prints required, as yet.

When questioned about whether or not students could afford a good camera, (the ones who don't have one already); Thomas said he would be interested in student response and will be available more this summer when he will be teaching here.

If you are interested and persistent, though, you might find him one day in W-153, where his office is located.

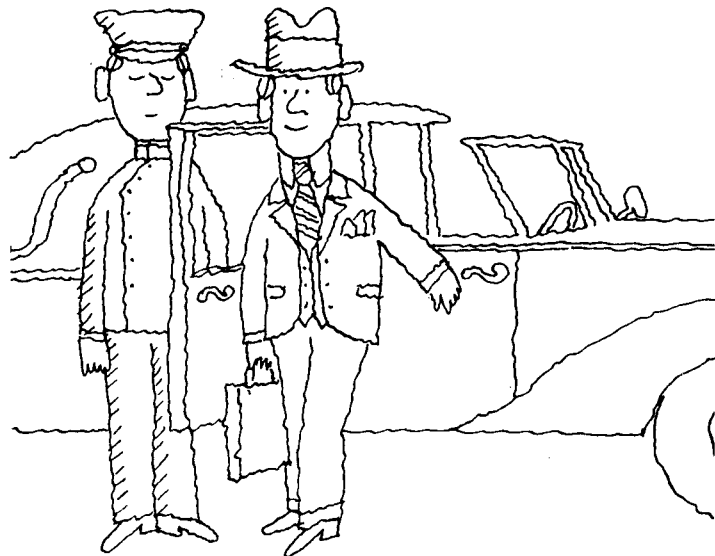

Mini-Opera Slated

Capitol's Fund for Research will be sponsoring a mini-opera entitled "Ruth," to be presented on Friday, May 7 at 1:30 p.m. in the Gallery Lounge.

The Colonial Players, a group of singers from the Colonial Park area will be performing the mini-opera.

This experience in theater was written by Dr. Eleanor Ebersole, assistant professor of education.

As part of the program sponsored by the Fund for Research, WZAP will be taping the opera and the multi-media students will do the editing.
