College is still good investment

Campus Digest News Service

Investing one's time and money in getting a college education now pays a return of about 9 percent according to calculations by Hal Cline, assistant professor of economics at the University of Rochester.

The present rate of return is down from the 10 percent level it was at a decade ago, said Cline. But college is still a relatively good investment, he said.

Pot used to supply energy

Campus Digest News Service

Under a new weeds-to-watts program, sponsored by the U.S. Customs Service and a Florida utility, marijuana will be used as a source of energy in south Florida.

Pot confiscated in the area will be burned at Florida Power & Light Company for conversion into kilowatts.

A spokesman for the company said that although nobody had ever done this before, they were not expecting any unusual emissions. She added that the company will be running some tests before they go into a full blown burn.

Burning pot to produce power will provide savings for the company while at the same time solving the problem of how to dispose of marijuana confiscated by U.S. Customs officials. Bales of dried and cured marijuana create such a hot fire that they have damaged conventional incinerators.

Customs will provide a specially-designed shredder-blower costing $70,000 to the utility.

Company officials say that light bills will not drop due to the pot-power program.
