VD still affects millions

Herpes II, a venereal disease, is incurable and many of its victims often suffer pain frequently.

At least 5 million Americans have genital herpes and this year another 500,000 will catch it. Victims of herpes notice the symptoms of the disease several days after they have had intercourse with an infected partner. Blisterlike sores appear on or near the sex organs and are often accompanied by fever, muscle aches and swollen lymph glands. Within a few weeks, the sores heal and the victim feels fine.

However, the disease is not cured. The viruses lie dormant at the base of the spine until the next attack. What triggers the new outbreak is unknown, but stress and menstruation seem to be two factors. Some victims never have a second attack, while others suffer from monthly attacks.

Herpes is most contagious during an active outbreak of the disease. It is often difficult to spot a recurrence of the disease because the symptoms are usually less severe. The sores are often buried deep within the vagina or male urethra where the victim may not notice them.

Herpes can also be transmitted even before the blisters appear. The viruses are active beneath the surface of the skin which leaves many patients with an itchy or tingling feeling. This may signal the beginning of the infectious stage.

Not only can herpes be transmitted to sex partners, a victim can also spread the disease to his eye by touching a herpes sore and then rubbing his eyes. Thousands of Americans lose their sight every year due to herpes.

Female herpes victims are also five to seven times more likely to develop cervical cancer. The disease can also cause serious birth defects. A pregnant woman with an active infection faces a 50 percent chance of passing the disease to her baby during delivery. Three-quarters of the infected newborns suffer blindness or brain damage and some die. Doctors monitor patients with a history of herpes and if sores are found close to the time of delivery, the doctor performs a Caesarean section to prevent the infection from spreading to the newborn as it passes through the birth canal.

Two drugs look promising for treatment of herpes but more testing still needs to be done.

Hazing continues

A freshman hockey player almost froze as the result of a hazing incident at the University of Michigan recently.

The student, who refused to be identified or to file a police report, was dumped in front of his dormitory, naked and drunk, in near-freezing temperatures.

According to a dormitory resident advisor, the student and four other players were forced to drink a fifth of vodka and then participate in a beer-drinking contest at which the spectators made bets on the outcome. After the competition, the student was forced into the trunk of a car and driven around before being let out at his dormitory, where he was found more than an hour later by some students.
