Pot growing advance

By Campus Digest News Service

Hydroponics has come to the marijuana industry.

Hydroponics is where plants are grown in mineral solutions rather than in soil, and is commonly used for tomato and cucumber growing.

Police in San Francisco recently discovered the marijuana industry's use of these advanced methods when they raided a warehouse in an industrial park that had what they described as a "sophisticated, state-of-the-art set-up" for hydroponic gardening of the product.

According to the Drug Enforcement Agency, the hydroponic plants had "at least twice as much THC (tetrahydrocannabinol, which is the active ingredient) as the best Colombian grass."

Market value of the seized crop was over $200,000.

Several makers of hydroponic equipment advertise in "High Times" magazine.

A high electricity bill helped give away the California project. Although the 2,100 square foot warehouse was rented for only $591 per month, the electrical bill suddenly rose from $25 per month for a normal warehouse of that size to $360 per month because of artificial lights needed to grow the crop.
