News from the muse

One of the purposes of the student newspaper is to provide a forum for student creativity. In past issues we have shared student poetry with our readers. Not only are these pieces shared with you now but all submissions will be considered for inclusion in TARNHELM, the Capitol Campus Literary Magazine to be published in the spring.

Contributions for this column or for TARNHELM can be given in W-129 or in our mailbox in the SGA offices, W-110.

This month we are featuring the poems of M. Lane Larsen, a humanities junior and regular editorial contributor to this paper.

BORDERS

There exists at every borderline, several kilometers deep into each country, an edge too far from the core, too near another land to acquire a native characteristic. The border describes less a distinct line between two nations than a transition between cultures, the people there having a neutral look and never wholly a part of either country they live astride. They speak a mongrel tongue according to the direction of journeyers who stop always only long enough to transact the small necessities of travel.

When I crossed the Iberian border, I set my watch to the hour just travelled and imagined I could suspend my life first spent in Spain, repeated in Portugal. Delayed at this edge by thoughts of an infinite life uncommitted, I chose to penetrate the country's heart where, I had heard, peasants garland their oxen and take them for walks on Sundays in the way of the Portuguese.
