The faculty holds “AI” high yet a small portion of the student populace do not hold a similar value to this principle. I feel that if this issue were pressed by the school, two specific outcomes would be found. 1. Those caught from the added scrutiny would be forced to leave the college, and 2. the image of PSH would take a hit. This would result in a possible lower-enrollment figure. Because of this reason, PSH will probably not pursue an active policy concerning academic integrity and continue on the paper path that it now adheres to.

I believe academic integrity is encouraged; however, I doubt that all students practice academic integrity and I doubt that those who stray from such integrity are punished accordingly.

Yes. Students work hard and independently, although joint problem resolution is expected. The faculty insists on independent work.

It seems that considering we are in college, a serious stand on academic integrity would be a given. However, it is my feeling that although every professor I’ve had has made it a point to emphasize how strict the policies on plagiarism are, it seems to me that in actuality students are getting away with a slap on the wrist when they should be expelled.

People do not care to think for themselves at PSH. Most students treat this place like a vo-tech school. The true power of education does not lie simply in technical skills. It lies more in the ability to think critically.
