Delegates to the 29th annual Model United Nations sat expectantly in the PSH Capital Union Building Thursday night. These high school students from 23 area school districts had accepted the role of civilian leaders to their adopted country and were prepared to change the world.

Seated on the dais behind the podium were the administrators, faculty and students of Penn State Harrisburg responsible for the daunting logistics of organizing an event of international proportions.

The guest roster included leaders from around the world and military consultants from the Army War College in Carlisle.

Dr. Khalipha M. Bility, associate professor of public health and a South African native, opened the event with a sobering update on the worldwide AIDS epidemic. He urged the delegates to take a global view of a problem which is often seen differently in various parts of the world.

Two car stereos stolen

Chief Stoehr suggests additional alertness in parking lots

By Barbara Gertzen

The reality of any university is that both positive and negative aspects of the local community infiltrate the campus environment.

According to Kevin Stoehr, director of safety and police services at Penn State Harrisburg, break-ins to two cars parked in the rear lot of the Olmsted building in recent weeks are part of a pattern of vehicular break-ins that have occurred in the area around PSH since the beginning of the year.

Stoehr reports that the first break-in on the PSH campus occurred on Jan. 29 when a $200 stereo/CD player was stolen from a car parked in the Olmsted lot. Even though the car owner had removed the stereo's detachable faceplate, the vandal took the rest of the unit from the car. On Feb. 6, a stereo/CD player valued at $350, along with speakers worth $200, were removed from another car in the lot.

Both incidents happened dur-
