

photos by Douglas Coolbaugh/ The Fourth Estate

Above: Rendell giving
his inaugural speech after being sworn
in. Right:
Festivities
were held in front of the Capitol
Building

Above: Rendell being sworn in before over 3,000 spectators. The temperature that day hovered in the 20s.

RENDELL SWORN IN

by Ted Sawchuck
of The Fourth Estate

Pennsylvania welcomed a new governor on Tuesday with the inauguration of Ed Rendell and his lieutenant governor Catherine Baker Knoll. Bitter cold and gusting wind didn't keep most of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives from attending, along with over 3,000 citizens.

The two main points of interest were Governor Rendell's speech and Lieutenant Governor Catherine Baker Knoll's speech, both of which highlighted their goals for the coming term.

Lieutenant Governor Knoll spoke first, having been sworn in in the state Senate chamber. At 10:30 her speech began. She wants Pennsylvanians to "come together" to form a "Team Pennsylvania" and "stop asking 'What's in it for me'." She would also like to get rid of labels like "the poor," "the homeless," and "the abused." Knoll ended by urging the crowd, "Let's reach for the clay together."

An hour or so later, the festivities began outside with a high school marching band and a benediction. After that Governor Rendell delivered a surprisingly somber speech, addressing the need to rectify the state budget deficit, rebuild the economy, stop brain drain, improve public education, fix the property tax system, and solve the medical malpractice problem. He's got a lot of work, and admitted that he'll be taking inspiration from the platforms of Bob Casey Jr. and Mike Fisher to tackle it.

The Governor summed it up best in one of the last lines in his speech. "The next four years promise to be a challenging and exciting time for Pennsylvania."