Local band on path to success

right now we're thinking we can't do [live], but we'll probably figure out how to do that," said Stewart.

To bring a fresh voice to the album, Hierosonic brought in Amanda Palmer of the Dresden Dolls for one of their songs. They also used parts from vintage telephones to pull off different effects.

There is nobody who solely writes their own music. "We all pretty much write every song together," said Stewart.

Many of the political and social concepts of the songs came from Stewart and the band as a whole built up songs around those ideas. "We've never struggled for material," said Cannon.

"Our biggest problem is finding what we want to cut. It's like you have 15 children and you can only take 13 along when you move," said Stewart.

Sometimes when they're looking for a clearer vision they back they're also driven to perform.

They've played shows in and around the Harrisburg area but have also taken their show on the road. Doing shows in Cleveland, Connecticut, Maine, New York, all the way down to West Virginia,

"It's kind of difficult to put into words. It was less the fact that we played in front of all those people, that was amazing, but the people we got to meet,"
 -Ben Stewart

Hierosonic has made themselves known in the Northeast venues.

The performance takes more than just five people to run smoothly though. Hierosonic has a behind the scenes crew taking care of the band's set-up and tear-down. "We've actually taken quite a few of those guys on the road with us," said Cannon.

"They're just as important, they're just behind the scenes [and] don't get the credit we do," said Cannon, "when the show goes off without a hitch we all feel gratified."

"The band is pretty much all we think about," said Stewart. With all this hard work and dedication to the band, the members have become almost closer than family.

"My only rule is that I don't put my family in jeopardy because of the band," says Cannon referring to his 2-year-old son and fiancé who is a psychology major at Penn State Harrisburg.

The band is so close to the point that if one had to move the rest would be willing to follow.

"My girlfriend is going to med school and there's a chance we'll have to move, and these guys said 'we'll go,'" said Cannon.

"Because of his family, if he needs to move, we go with," replied Stewart standing by Cannon.

"It might seem extreme, but you're doing it for your future," said Cannon. "I think the reason why people see it as extreme is because it is in fact a dream, not an actual reality," said Cannon

Their album release will be taking place at the Dragonfly nightclub in downtown Harrisburg on November 4. Their main reasons for choosing the Dragonfly is that it has a big stage a great sound system, but most importantly it is one of the few places they can perform to an all-ages crowd. They say some of their most diehard fans are of a younger audience.

Hierosonic has taken the future into their own hands and the reality of it is they're about to go on a nationwide tour after their album release.

up and reproduce a song that has already been finished. "[It] helps us end up with a product we want," said Stewart.

But the production doesn't end there. Not only is Hierosonic driven to perfect their album, but

The band usually only has a fifteen minute interval to set up after the previous band. But the previous band must also tear down their set in that fifteen-minute interval.

Hierosonic's crew can have their equipment set up in 8 minutes.
