THE DAIMIOS OF JAPAN. The passion of the Empress for dress amounts will, in a very short period, absorb the balance The regal Government, as it is now constituted, is hopelessly effete, and seems to be used chiefly as a political instrument by the ambitious Daimios and the priesthood. Of all the anomalies which are found in this extraordinary country, one of the greatest consists in the social restrictions which have been long acquiesced in by the nobles, although they have constituted, in effect, the ruling power of the state. Notwhelming political influence, they have submit-ted for centuries to the most galling and humi-liating limitations of their freedom. For six months of the year these great princes were com-pelled to reside at Yeddo, and, on leaving the capital for their estates, they left their wives and families as hostages for their loyalty. Immured for one half of his life in his provincial castle, cut off from all social intercourse with his equals, a Japanese noble passed his time amidst his armed dependents revelling in the licentiousness and epicurism of a Sardanapalus, and surrounded only by flatterers and slaves. In conformity with state precautions and the rules of a conventional etiquette, only blood relations are permitted to associate with each other. If one Daimio should visit another, it would be a recognition of his superiority; pride, therefore, alone keeps them apart. These unhappy noblemen find no resource in the improvement of their estates, nor are they addicted to field sports. Habits of intoxication, originating in seclusion and want of occupation, are said to be prevalent, and other vicious indulgences are freely resorted to for relieving the insufferable tedium of a life passed without any healthy moral excitements. Even in these lonely retreats the curse of Japanese life haunts the palace of the Daimio. He is surrounded by spies, and his enemies are those of his own household. He may be denounced to the Tycoon for a hasty comment, an equivocal expression, or an unguarded jest; and a sudden and rational attire. summons to the capital may determine him to anticipate disgrace by suicide. The spirit of suspose, brings into existence myriads of spies, who engender universal distrust and scatter the seed of conspiracies and false accusations broadcast over the land. The misery of such a state of existence, in which life is rendered one scene of constant restraint, has encouraged among the nobility the practice of early abdication, for a reigning prince of advanced age is rarely seen in His reason must grow out of the experience of Japan; he either resigns his oppressive dignity life. FAMILY GOVERNMENT-HINTS ONLY. BY REV. JOHN TODD, D. D. I am speaking to those whose children are young-with characters unformed, with faculties undeveloped. Don't drop the paper saying to yourself: "I can't get time to read or plan. He can't sympathize with me. I have burdens heavy enough daily, without being lectured." Softly, softly. It may be possible that if I can't relieve you of any of your burdens, I can help you to bear them. Those little ones__the flowers of the hearth, the sunbeams in your dwelling, are worth to you and to themselves all your anxieties, and cares, and toils, and they will, if rightly trained, repay a thousand fold all they cost you. Remember that you are to your child a friend, a ruler, and a teacher. To control him, readily and fully, you must at all times govern yourself. If the child sees that you are irritable, hasty, ill-tempered and passionate-and he will understand this very early, I shall not now explain why it is so-but the fact is undeniable that he who would control others, must control himself. If, then, you act and decide, say yes or no, smile or frown, ac-cording as you happen to feel at the moment, you make that child feel that you are as liable to treat him with injustice as otherwise. He can't respect passion or temper. You lose in his respect and also in his love. And your obhis respect and also in his love. And your ob-servation will teach you that among all your reconsintances you can't think of one instance rendered almost omniscient for every bad puracquaintances, you can't think of one instance where parents have good family government, who cannot govern themselves. Insist on prompt, cheerful obedience, and that without giving the reasons.

It is a very common mistake to appeal to the reason of your child and show him how reasonable your command is. The fact is, the child has no reason to which you can appeal. placed him in subjection to you, because you have reason and he has not.
