

Oswald Speaks On Progress

University Park, Pa., March 27
"Is it inherently better to be bigger, stronger, faster?"

This was one of the questions raised today by Dr. John W. Oswald, president of The Pennsylvania State University, in his remarks to the 1,230 graduates receiving their degrees at the Winter Term commencement exercises at Penn State.

"Is all increased mechanization also progress or is it a social decadence and impersonal blight? How does this increase in power and mobility serve us and how does it destroy our quietude?" Dr. Oswald continued.

Never before has there been such general concern among youth as to what is a better, fuller life for ourselves and for all people, the Penn State president continued, asking if, "just because we know how to do something faster or to go farther, is it human wisdom to do so?"

Dr. Oswald said that this questioning of progress, of what is really advancement in the quality of life, seemed to him to be the basis of much of the student unrest.

"For some older people, these questions shake the very foundations of life's focus. A generation ago there was seemingly little doubt that more was better," he continued.

"And yet all of us stand to benefit from at least pausing to look around and see in what directions various choices lead."

Dr. Oswald told the graduates — among them more than 300 receiving advanced degrees — that "the exciting thing about this generation is that for the most part you are choosing in great numbers to deal with the survival crises of our time."

"Sometimes," he continued, "older people urge more patience, additional experience, seasoned wisdom — but the important fact is that most of you are choosing to use the opportunity to be a part of the determination of direction for our world."
