ROAD HAMPERS STUDENTS!

Above is pictured one of our students trapped in one of the holes typical of the eroded road leading to our campus. His car is completely immobilized, thus causing his tardiness to Economics class, along with the other unfortunate students who are also held up behind him. Due to its awkward position on the road, his car becomes easy prey for anyone coming from either direction.

In addition, this hole, and many more, continually slice away at tires. Although this situation is great for the tire industry, it hits the students and instructors where it hurts.

Nobody seems to know why this poor example of highway construction exists, but everyone agrees that it does. We have built two beautiful parking lots which have been paid for by the students through parking fees, (see article "Students want to know" section one), because the State feels that students should pay for privileged activities, and, for some reason, driving to a commuting college is considered a privilege.

If driving to school is a privilege then, maybe, we should pay for all the roads we use in commuting to Highacres. Of course this is out of the question, but the question is this:

Who should pay for the repair of this so-called road? Obviously the state isn't going to. Are the students going to have to pay for this too, out of pockets already drained to their limits, or should the campus, itself use its resources to alleviate this situation?

There has been no word from anyone, official or unofficial, that any action is being considered or has already been initiated to rectify this hazardous eye sore of our otherwise beautiful grounds. However, if there should be any, someone should let the students know about it.
