NEW COURSES COME TO PENN STATE

A new undergraduate program with some significant departures from traditional college curricula will go into effect in the College of Human Development at Penn State, beginning with the winter term.

Focused on preparing undergraduates for a wide variety of professions in human services, the program stresses the responsibility of the student to shape his own education within the scope of the major he selects, according to his own interests and professional goals; places heavy interest on the problem solving approach and student involvement in real life situations; and employs educational strategies that encourage self directed study.

Three new majors, which integrate previous programs of the College in a new format will be introduced by three of the College's four divisions. The Division of Biological Health will offer a major in Biological Health with options in health planning and Administration and in nutrition; the Division of Individual and Family Studies will offer a major in Individual and Family Studies with options in Individual Development and in Family Studies; and the Division of Man Environment Relations will offer a new major in Consumer Related studies.

The University is also offering an experimental new graduate course on the "Literature of the Occult". This new course is designed to make students more aware of the important role played in occultism in man's political, religious, and literary history. To aid in this study of witchcraft and spiritualism the course will draw material from such modern readings as "Rosemary's Baby" and from the viewing of "Dracula" films.
