

RECOLLECTIONS MRS. ENAMA

by Doreen Mayo

In conjunction with the special historical interest of this issue of the COLLEGIAN, interviews have been held with many people who have spent a long time at Highacres. One of these people is Mrs. Enama, a lady we are sure many of you have seen or spoken to at one time or another. Mrs. Enama's office is right next to Dr. David's in the Main Building.

Mrs. Enama's memories extend all the way back to when Highacres wasn't yet Highacres and the buildings in use for classes were old Hazleton School district building which were not in use at the time. In 1946 the Walnut Street School also became a part of the growing Penn State campus here in Hazleton. Elementary students used the building at the same time as the college students.

The next place that was used by the students and faculty of the Hazleton Campus of Penn State was the Markle Mansion, now commonly known as the Main Building. Mrs. Enama remembers that all the furniture has to be removed from the mansion in order to allow classroom to be made out of the rooms in the mansion. The dining room of the estate is now the Student Affairs office.

At that time, the South Building was a greenhouse, which later was put into use as an engineering lab. There was a flagstone walk in the places which are covered by macadam now.

Mrs. Enama fondly remembers the closeness between the students and the teachers then. The teachers were given the opportunity to get to know the smaller amount of students well. A large number of W.W. II veterans were among the students who then attended Highacres.

Speaking of school functions and the like, Mrs. Enama remembers that all school affairs were well-attended, and recalls that students had to rent a hall to hold a dance.

She also remembers, not so fondly as many other things, that all of the grading on campus was handled completely by herself and Mrs. Reichart. They didn't have a computer to handle the red tape and the reports cards. Three cheers for Collosus!
