

26 to 14!

No, it's not the score of the annual Blue and White football game held each spring at University Park--it is the score of the annual softball game held at Highacres, and the faculty blitzed the students by that score.

The Faculty team scored easily and often, and before the fifth inning was over, the students fell (really) behind by as much as 13 runs. But then things began to change--the students began fighting back. Joe Snead bit "Splendid Splinter" Concannon's little finger as he was rounding third to score again; "Ducky" Binns tired from waddling around the outfield too much; "Six Million Dollar" Krone developed a hole in his bionic glove and "Shampoo" Breckenridge began dozing at second base. Then the water container, source of the Faculty energy, dried up.

Each team sported beautiful co-eds as pitchers and they even hit the ball well, too. Everyone had a joyous time, making errors and pretending they were really good athletes. Outside of Professor Concannon's little finger being mangled by the hungry Snead, no one else was injured on the field. Several days later team Faculty in inaudible terms, suggested that their old bones were aching but they were good aches, because they had creamed the students and didn't even need Broadway Joe's Noxema to do it. Soccer, anyone?

and photography shows and the juried art and photography shows were held in the Library, and such varied items as hand-crafted violin to an intricate dollhouse were on display.

Performances were held all weekend, two at a time, one in C-1 and one under the tent in front of the Main Building. They included everything from music to dance to drama to film to karate.

A number of Highacres students and faculty participated in the festival. Donna Marie Bayer and Cheryl Matteo, winners of the Highacres Reading Festival, read their selections Saturday morning. The Chorus sang Sunday afternoon, followed by a medley by Joseph Jumpeter. A Renaissance Music Ensemble was presented by Dr. Christie Lerch, Jay and Kathie Breckenridge and Jerry and Carol Covert. Jim Concannon served as one of the masters of ceremonies for all of the performances. The Hazleton Campus sponsored an exhibit on student affairs and activities, while Christie Tito had one of her color photographs in the juried art and photography show. Everitt Binns was chairman of the house committee, with Barry Jais serving as co-chairman, and Francie Grencavich, Brad McNab and Susan Petrilla on the committee. Brenda Binns was in charge of the layout for the

The New Horizons Literary Magazine was released on campus last Friday in honor of the Fine Arts Festival.

The magazine contains examples of prose, poetry, drama, art and photography by Highacres students, faculty and staff.

Editors of the magazine are Donald Serfass and Donna Marie Bayer. The editorial board consists of Christie Tito, Barbara Mace, Christine Slivka and Marvin Swantek.

The magazine is dually dedicated to Everitt F. Binns, for support and initiation of cultural activities at Highacres, and to Prof. Andrew Kafka, for 20 years of service to the Hazleton Campus.

festival program. Mrs. Binns is also recording secretary of the Greater Hazleton Area Fine Arts Council. Representatives to the Fine Arts Council from Highacres are Everitt and Brenda Binns and Jim Concannon.

Binns called the Festival "a success," and said that he was pleased with the turnout which increased from 600 last year at the YMCA to 5,000.

The Student Union Board of the campus spent time and energy setting up, making signs, and making themselves generally useful.

essary forms to receive a $2 refund. Oswald noted that it was estimated that about 30 percent of the students would pay the dues voluntarily, yet under the mandatory donation with the refund system, about 70 percent could be expected to no attempt to collect the $2 back. Despite his misgivings over this point, Pres. Oswald stated his intent to recommend to the Board of Trustees that Penn State join PIRG.

Pres. Oswald spent the remainder of his visit with the students, answering their questions on tuition, financial aid, room and board plans and additional funds for Student Government and activities.
