EDITORIAL

An American flag fluttering in the breeze at the peak of a strong flag pole is a true sign of freedom to everyone who sees it. One gets a feeling of loyalty when he sees such a sight, and he knows that whoever originated this idea was proud to display this symbol of his free country.

Because a flagpole and a flag are dependent upon each other, a flag pole without a flag can truly be called a pole without a country, and flag without its support to the breeze seems lifeless and dormant---a poor example of our nation. It is a fact that Highacres has on its grounds both a pole without a country and a perfectly usable flag that is at present in a state of folded dormancy.

After discovering these facts, we wonder why these two objects that go so well together are separated. After inquiring briefly, it has been discovered that the problem of adjusting a pulley to the pole is the immediate drawback. It has also been stated that the cost of this operation would be no more than five to six dollars---a comparatively little amount for a really indispensable college campus item.

Our flag pole is situated in a very appropriate position visible for miles across Conyngham Valley and would be a very impressive sight if adorned with our national symbol.

When will our pole without a country become repatriated?
