of another black mark: official laxity. The following is the first of a series of anonymous articles written to change that laxity into efficiency. Let's see how fair you people are, if you give both sides a say.

Unless my memory is much more faulty than I believe it is, some members of the Student Council, while campaigning for that office, made specific promises to the electorate of this college which they have thus far made no effort to fulfill. This official laxity has been neither explained nor repented. The councilers have just proceeded to ignore the promises under which they were elected. Having received the votes for which they asked, they have done nothing concrete to satisfy the agreement by which these votes were given to them. The voters have fulfilled their part of the contract, and until our leaders awake and fulfill theirs the contract cannot be destroyed nor the councilers' obligations to the public discharged.

I am particularly concerned with the laissez faire attitude Council has taken toward solving our parking problem. I wonder how many students who daily must climb the "hill" are sorry they didn't elect students that were ready - no, eager - to solve this problem. Either Council is ignorant of the fact that we have a parking problem or it refuses to solve it.

If it is ignorant of its existence, may this column at least inform Council that - in the opinion of many students - we have a parking problem.

If it is cognizant of its existence, then Council either does not desire to seek its solution or, surrendering to a seemingly impregnable obstacle, it has given up in despair, believing there is no solution.

If it believes there is no solution, Council had no right (and in fact was morally wrong) in promising to solve what they couldn't. If they do not desire to erase this problem, they have no right to hold their seat on Student Council because they do not represent the best interests of the students of Penn State.

There is a solution to this problem. At least it's a start. I will write about that next week, but until then, let's hear from Council.

(Ed. note - This is a Democracy and freedom of press is one of our weapons. We will be fair and willing to give both sides a say as long as it is within our limits)

DANCING CLASS

The Social Committee - bless its over-worked heart - is sponsoring a dancing class next Thursday evening. It will be held in the Main Lounge at eight o'clock. The Committee assures everyone that music will be supplied by the finest dance orchestras. All this and no admission, so come and join the fun.
