

Eye on THON

Photo by Anteia Consorto Nolan Quell, one of many children at this year's THON, high-fives with one of the dancers. Nolan's brother was diagnosed with cancer, and his family wanted to show its gratitude to and support of the dancers by spending the weekend on the floor. The Quell family was just one of many that benefit from all the hard work THON members do throughout the year.

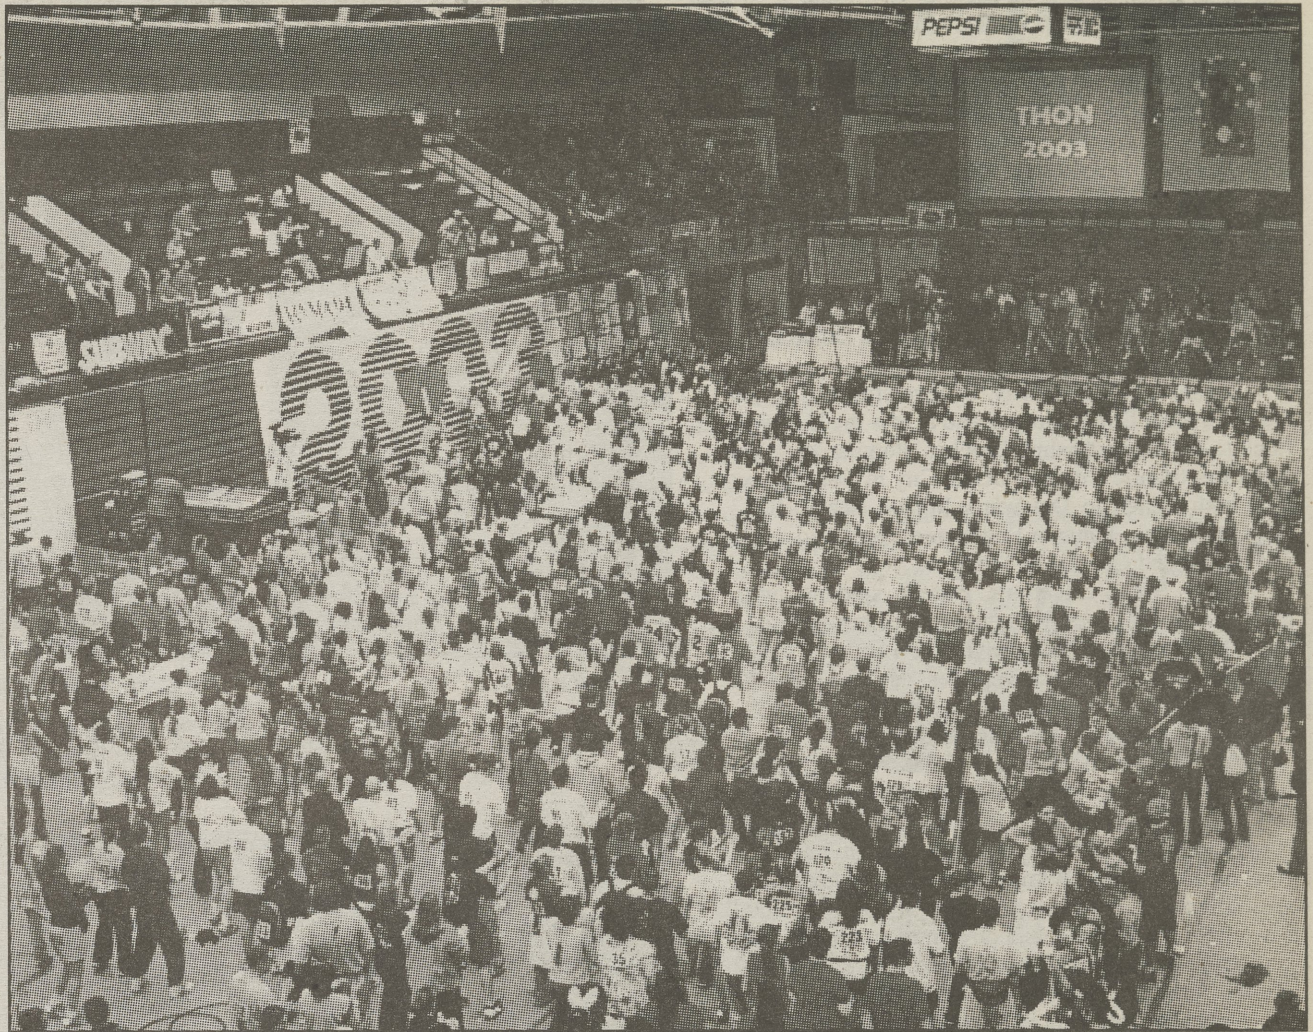

Photo by James Gilson Rec Hall in University Park is jammed with participants in THON 2003. Participants danced for 48 hours to raise money for children with cancer. Many students from Delco made the trip to support campus dancers Kathleen Iaci and John Coyle.

Photo by Anteia Consorto Dancer mail delivery: The supportive messages helped keep the dancers going all weekend.

Photo by Anteia Consorto THON raised 3,600,793.18 for the Four Diamonds Fund. This money will help fight pediatric cancer.

Photo by Anteia Consorto Pradeep Kulkarni and Ed Rich lift John and Kathleen off the floor in an effort to relieve their tired feet during the last few hours.

Photo by Anteia Consorto John Coyle, right, one of dancers who represented Delco, takes a direct hit from a water gun of one of the event's beneficiaries.

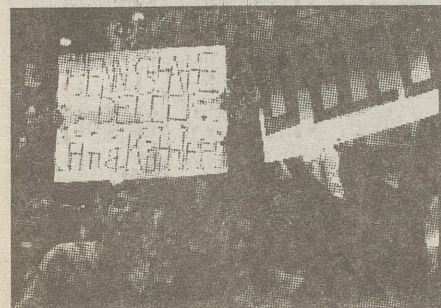

Photo by Anteia Consorto Penn State Delco students showed their support to John Coyle and Kathleen Iaci.

Photo by Anteia Consorto A group of Delco supporters were on hand to support dancers Kathleen Iaci, standing at right, and John Coyle, kneeling at lower left. The weekend would have felt much longer had it not been for the supporters.