Rabbit Indirectly Causes Fox Death

According to Game Protector Arthur T. Biondi, Mercer County, Robert Eperthener, a conservation-minded motorist, of R. D. 4, Grove City, Pennsylvania, observed an interesting drama, and to prove it produced a fox pelt which was sent to Harrisburg for bounty.

While returning home late one evening in May, a rabbit dashed across the road in front of Mr. Eperthener's automobile. He swerved the car quickly to avoid hitting the rabbit; nevertheless, his car hit something with a loud thump. Upon turning around and returning to the scene, there on the road lay a fox, fatally injured. The rabbit had turned aside in time to avoid being struck, but the fox, in close pursuit, could not get out of the way of the auto. Net results — one little rabbit was responsible for the killing of one large fox!

Livestock Control Woodcock Cover

Woodcock habitat in the Bald Eagle Valley of Centre County has been improved through the use of cattle grazing, a little-known wildlife management procedure.

The objective is to ascertain the value of livestock in controlling woodcock cover and to determine the degree of grazing necessary to improve it. In this case a 16-acre area that had become so thick of briars and brush it was almost worthless as woodcock habitat was fenced and eight young cattle were enclosed in the "patch" for 4½ months in summer. Steers proved best for opening up the brush. After 4 consecutive years of summer grazing by an average of eight head of cattle this tract of bottomland brush is much better than it was when the experiment was started. So reports Steve Liscinsky, the Game Commission's research technician in charge of the woodcock study in Pennsylvania.
