states where our population is growing rapidly. How well these resources are protected for both present and future generations is the real challenge facing those concerned with soil conservation programs today", Alampi said.

Pennsylvania Secretary of Agriculture William L. Henning opened the conference Sunday. He outlined the historical interest of Pennsylvania farmers in soil and water conservation and the rapid growth of Soil Conservation Districts in the State.

"Our farmers operating Soil Conservation Districts have shown that they have in mind the welfare of their community through the interest and leadership they have exhibited in establishing plans for small watershed water control projects. Sponsored by Soil Conservation Districts, the State Soil Conservation Commission has on file 46 applications for small watershed projects. Construction is underway on three and ready to start on others," Secretary Henning said.

"We are urging expansion of the federal budget so that more of these beneficial water control projects may be started quickly in Pennsylvania," he reported.
