WASHINGTON REPORT

Congressman Edwin D. Eshleman

16th District-Pennsylvania

Certainly one of the great issues of the past several years has been civil rights. Probably it will continue as a major subject of debate for some years to come and the importance of finding the best answers to the problems involved cannot be overstressed. Since here, perhaps more than in any other part of legislative activity, we are dealing in the future of fellow men — all 200 million — civil rights is an extremely emotional issue.

Trouble has arisen in recent years when some civil rights leaders have made the cause a strictly emotional matter. They have done large groups of citizens a real injustice by tying a basically responsible movement to all kinds of lawless behavior. Rioting, looting and even murder have been called justifiable because of a variety of conditions that can no longer be accepted. Admittedly, some of the conditions do need correction, but resorting to criminal action will solve none of society's problems.

The real tragedy of the turn to lawlessness becomes more obvious when you look at the record of accomplishment achieved at all levels of government while civil rights were advancing in the accepted legal structure. The separate but equal philosophy that had divided the country for so long was well on its way toward abolishment. Schools and other public facilities had been desegregated, voting rights were being guaranteed to all, and any number of other essential moves were being made.

Now, irresponsible leaders, who use civil rights as a guise, have, in reality, slowed progress considerably by bringing two important new elements into the picture

First, attitudes that were in the process of change have been hardened by the displays of violence. Long-standing prejudices on both sides of the issue have found new reasons for venting their hate. Many deserving people are caught in the middle of this re-opening of wounds, and they are likely to suffer as a result

Second, the government has been forced into a position of re-evaluation of cause for legislative action. So far, legislation in many respects has encouraged the preachers of violence by giving in to their demands. We have entered an era of government by muscle and, if continued, a complete legislative breakdown is a conceivable end result

Legislative bodies, that in the past were basically deliberative in nature, have given in to rule by pressure in some cases. In other words, if a group is able to put together a big enough mob of demonstrators or do enough damage, it is likely to get what it wants from the government. Such a situation is bad even when a laudible purpose is at stake, for our system of law is not based on the idea that the means justify the end. We believe, rather, that our problems can be solved through reason, and that pattern of government must not be openly jeopardized.

Government, in the face of all emotional reactions, has a real obligation to separate the responsible and irresponsible elements of the civil rights cause. Such an obligation demands a pooling of reason, justice, law and order. No gains for the future will result from further encouragement of the advocates of rule by muscle.
