National FFA President At Plow Contest

Hershey — Greg Bamford, national president of the Future Farmers of America, termed activities at the National Plowing Contest "the most elaborate seen anywhere in the United States this year."

Bamford, who lives on a 5,400-acre wheat and cattle ranch at Huxton, Colo., came East to represent the 454,000-member organization at the National Plowing Contest.

The FFA president pointed out that the educational events and activities conducted here this week make it especially valuable to the agricultural segments of our society.

Bamford will go to Washington, D.C., next week to testify on present farm safety standards and assist in devising ways of improving existing ones.

He interrupted his studies at Colorado State University to fulfill his duties as national officer.
