Keep Emergency Food On Hand

It's just good common sense to have some emergency foods on hand and a way of preparing them for the family, reminds Harold E Neigh, extension consumer economics specialist of The Pennsylvania State University

Storage space usually permits keeping a supply of emergency foods. Canned foods retain their quality for long periods without special attention. Other products to have on hand for emergencies include coffee and tea, especially the instant variety, nonfat dry milk because it can be used in many ways, and powdered fruit drinks, according to Neigh

On a trip to your local food store, you can select foods your family needs and that will provide a well balanced diet. Choose foods that are easy to store and perhaps take a minimum of preparation. Put your emergency foods in a special place so they'll be there when needed

Neigh says it's a good idea to rotate emergency foods. Use ones on hand and then replace with new purchases. Plan ahead and be prepared for an emergency, such as a time when electricity is off or another unforeseen situation arises, he advises.
