International Air Service At Olmsted Would Benefit Farmers

State Agriculture Secretary Leland H. Bull believes Harrisburg could become the hub of a world-wide food distribution system if international air service should be added to advantages already available at Olmsted State Airport.

"Studies made by the Pennsylvania Department of Agriculture show that Olmsted is a highly desirable site for a food distribution center to serve markets in the heavily populated Northeast," Secretary Bull said. "It is close to food producing and processing areas," Secretary Bull pointed out, "and is linked to major domestic markets by rapidly expanding air cargo service and a network of rail lines and high-speed highways."

Preparations are now under way to obtain U.S. custom and immigration facilities at Olmsted, a step that would open the airport to international service. The move is being spearheaded by the Pennsylvania Aeronautics Commission in cooperation with the Chamber of Commerce of Greater Harrisburg.

In endorsing this action, Secretary Bull said the move could have significant economic advantages for Pennsylvania agriculture and the state's four-billion-dollar food industry. The Pennsylvania Department of Agriculture, he pointed out, has participated in food trade missions in Europe, Japan and the Caribbean in the past two years and is actively engaged in seeking ways to expand foreign markets for Pennsylvania farm and food products.

"I have instructed the directors of our Bureaus of Animal and Plant Industries to contact their counterparts in neighboring states and in the U.S. Department of Agriculture to determine what would be required at Olmsted. This is especially important in dealing with any plant and animal quarantines that may be imposed," he said.

"The importance on international air service to a potential food distribution center at Olmsted cannot be over-emphasized," Secretary Bull declared.

Fertilizer

Applying fertilizer at this time of year to stimulate growth on shrubs, trees or roses should not be practiced. New growth late in the Fall is likely to become a victim of more severe winter killing. We therefore discourage any fertilizer applications until the plants have become dormant. Rose bushes, however, should be sprayed regularly for control of insects and diseases, the stronger the plant as it goes into the winter, the less the danger of winter killing. Later in the Fall and just before the ground freezes, it is advisable to place a mound of topsoil around the plants covering the main stem for further protection.
