Ladies, Have You Heard? . . .

By Doris Thomas, Extension Home Economist

Does Your Home Freezer Pay Its Way?
If you have a freezer half full of food or do not use it very often, it's a good bet it is not paying its way

The cost of owning and operating a freezer should be figured the same way you figure automobile costs It costs more per mile to drive a car a few miles than it does to drive many miles It costs more per pound to store a little food than a lot There is interest on the payment, depreciation, repairs, and electricity All of these are overhead costs and one would have this cost to pay whether the freezer was empty or full

Let's say you paid $400 for a freezer and overhead costs amounted to $80 a year If you used 300 pounds of frozen food in a year it would cost 27 cents a pound to store that food But, if you used 900 pounds it would only cost nine cents a pound.

To be economical, a freezer should be used as a checking account not a savings account

Since storage costs are the same on all foods, you may be wondering if it makes any difference what kinds of food are put in the freezer, from a savings standpoint Yes, it does, very definitely.

If the goal of owning a freezer is to save money, then foods that are purchased at lower prices than normal, providing they are of the same quality one usually buys, are the foods that should be stored

But many families prefer a freezer for convenience for storing prepared main dishes, baked goods, desserts, etc., in addition to staples

THOMAS

If you follow the following tips, you can really make your freezer pay for itself!

Freezers, like work schedules and budgets, must be managed if you are to make the most of the freezer space you have

Freeze foods you need and use often

Keep your freezer full or nearly full all the time

Use your freezer every day. Economical operation depends on quick turnover

By all means, keep an accurate inventory of some kind.

Knowing what is on hand helps you plan more interesting meals.
