

Farmers, Check Blighted Stored Corn for Insects

With the onset of weather elevator operators to check care-favorable to insect development, fully for insect infestations in the U.S. Department of Agriculture stored corn damaged by South-culture advises farmers and ern corn leaf blight.

Tests conducted by Harrison E. McGregor, entomologist of USDA's Agricultural Research Service at Manhattan, Kansas, indicate that blighted corn is more attractive to certain stored-product insects than is non-blighted corn, and more favorable for their growth and development.

In the two types of tests run, rice weevils favored blighted corn to nonblighted corn, and more than three times as many rice weevils and more than nine times as many red flour beetles developed in a single generation on blighted corn than were produced on undamaged corn

These results suggest that farmers and elevator operators with blight-damaged corn should (1) examine the stored corn more closely and frequently than normal for insect infestation, and (2) be prepared to use approved stored-grain insect control measures if the corn has not previously been treated

If the corn is infested, it should be fumigated where possible. Applying malathion or synergized pyrethrins sprays to the surface of the corn will help prevent reinfestation and hold down surface infestation of moths, according to ARS scientists.

If storage space is available, the corn can be moved into bins that have been cleaned and sprayed. Apply a malathion spray to the corn as it is moved, to provide continuing protection against infestation. Further details on controlling stored-product insects in corn can be obtained from local county extension agents.
