Ida's Notebook

We had a nice boatripe up the Conestoga on a Sunday afternoon. There were little folks fishing and big folks sunning themselves.

Some of the trees we could not identify and so Philip gave me a book on "Trees" for my birthday.

It says the flowers of the California buckeye have a nectar which is poisonous to bees and creates a serious problem.

Somehow I get linden and ash trees mixed even though they aren't similar. Guess I'd better study my book.

The village of Oregon is near our farm. In years past it was known as "Catfish" and had a mill, store, post office, cigar factory, barbers, blacksmith and butcher shops. Now it is just a hamlet.

Upon studying a map drawn 75 years ago and listing the residences, I notice only two families whose descendants still live in the area. Though the children no longer use the school, the 35 families still worship in the small, white church.

The Lutz Creek which flows through is a small stream compared to its breadth when the mill was making flour and had the water dammed back.

Shoo-fly pies aren't just a delicious Pennsylvania Dutch food at our house. They even provide us with a laugh.

One time my big boy made six pies and forgot to put a crust under them until just before he put them in the oven — what a mess. He is often teased about that.

Dairy Case Packaging Look-Alike Trend Noted

In a column in "Ad Age," Walter Margulies, president of Lippincott and Margulies, a packaging design firm in New York, says a look-alike trend is the general rule in dairy case packaging.

Margulies noted Sealtest's Lite 'n Lively line of dairy products was an example of good branding. "It holds the appeal that both the taste — and ultimately you — will be light and lively."

"The packaging on the other hand, is nearly indistinguishable from its competitors. At best, it's colorful."
