Toys Teach

Toys and play materials educate. Toys help the child learn to control and direct his muscles, understand and imitate the activities in the world around him, and express his ideas and feelings.

To profile a wide range of experiences, play materials need to be varied in type. Mrs. Carol Rothermel, assistant Chester County Extension home economist, offers this list of the types of play children need for development and the kinds of toys that stimulate such play.

Active — Push and pull toys, wheel toys, games and gym equipment are typical playthings that aid in physical development.

Creative and manipulative — Construction toys, building blocks, drawing and painting equipment and hobby kits aid creative play. This type of play is important because it teaches children how to use their hands and provides for the expression of ideas. It also frees the imagination, allows for the use of initiative, stimulates the powers of observation and develops resourcefulness.

Dramatic — Housekeeping equipment, train systems and dress-up costumes stimulate dramatic play. This type of play also encourages imaginative expression and helps the child learn, through imitating adult activities.

Social — Games in which several children can take part are essential aids to social development. By sharing play activity, children learn how to get along with each other and acquire a basic understanding of good sportsmanship. They also learn how to concentrate and how to think quickly and accurately.
