Wool Stabilizer

Home seamstresses who find the process of shrinking woollens before sewing a nuisance, will soon find that problem eliminated.

Mrs. Ruth Ann Wilson, Extension clothing specialist at The Pennsylvania State University, reports that the textile industry has developed a process to stabilize wool and wool-blend fabrics to a residual shrinkage of one-half to one percent.

The traditional cold-water shrinking and steam-sponging techniques usually applied to woollens and worsteds result in a possible three to four percent shrinkage.

Unlike some previous stabilization processes, the new technique does not affect the hand of the fabric.

Mrs. Wilson explains that the process - yet to be named - involves spraying the fabric with a specially developed resin in addition to decreasing the shrinkage, the process stabilizes treated fabric against various humidity and temperature changes that cause ballooning and puckering.

and the new engine plant in Ulm. They will also visit the KHD museum, which houses the world's first four-stroke engine. They'll also visit a German tractor dealer

Stauffer Wins German Trip

Amos Stauffer of Stauffer Diesel, Inc. in New Holland, has won a trip to Cologne, Germany in a nationwide contest conducted by Deutz Tractor Corporation.

Accompanying Mr. Stauffer on the trip will be his wife. Along with other Deutz dealers, they will leave from New York on Sunday, February 11, and return a week later.

In addition to sightseeing, the Americans will tour the Deutz tractor assembly line in Cologne
