of much larger amounts of money and credit to buy only slightly larger quantities of goods and services. It might seem highly coincidental that more or less the same thing has happened in so many other countries as well as in the United States. It is no coincidence, however. Modern nations tend to follow the examples of others. Democratic nations have followed the economic leadership of the stronger countries. The United States has been the example imitated by many since World War II. The total effect of all countries acting this way in concert has been a reduction in the value or purchasing power of money, whether it be the American dollar, the British pound, the French franc, or the Japanese yen. As money becomes less valuable it takes more of it to buy anything-or, in other words, prices rise.

Inflation has not been uniform throughout the world, being more severe in some countries than others. This differential inflation has resulted in the devaluation of some currencies relative to others. Differing rates of inflation are due partly to different degrees of success with which countries conduct their internal and external financial affairs and partly to different rates of efficiency or changes in the efficiency of production between nations.

In the past 18 months, the United States has devalued the dollar twice; the dollar is now officially worth about 20 percent less in gold and in some other currencies than it was two years ago. The devaluation was Higher deemed necessary because of our large unfavorable balance of international payments. How did these unfavorable balances come about?

Reasons For Unfavorable U.S. Trade Balance

A number of factors have contributed to our unfavorable trade balance. Efficiency of production has risen in other parts of the world as compared with that of the U.S., thus making American products less attractive to foreign buyers and affecting our exports. At the same time, a low level of restrictions on imports of foreign goods in the United States has resulted in increased imports and an unfavorable trade balance in the past two years. Relatively low interest rates in the U.S. have resulted in a flow of dollars into overseas investments. American tourists have increasingly gone overseas and spent money. Added to the above are our military aid and development program expenditures. Over a period of time, the above factors have resulted in the holding by foreigners of 80 billion dollars-dollars difficult to redeem for goods and services. Furthermore, internal deficit spending has fueled inflation and helped to make our exports less attractive.

Dollar Devaluation Spurs Foreign Demand

Our balance of payments deficit was a prime factor in our successive devaluations of the dollar. What does devaluation of the dollar mean in international terms? That our dollar is not worth as much as it used to be in terms of foreign currency. It will buy fewer marks, francs, or yen than before devaluation. Or, put another way, it takes fewer marks, francs, or yen to buy a dollar. This makes foreign goods more expensive to American buyers and should decrease our imports while it makes our exports cheaper to foreign buyers and should increase exports. If we sell more abroad and buy less, our trade balance should be favorably affected and thus our balance of payments deficit would decline and the dollar become stronger.

Our agricultural products become more attractive to foreign buyers. A given amount of francs, marks, or yen now buys more American farm products than before devaluation. Demand for such products from foreigners increases and our farm exports go up Foreign buyers are thus better able to compete for our farm products with American
