ED ESHLEMAN'S WASHINGTON REPORT

The Nation is faced with an energy crisis. It is not an imaginary crisis. We definitely have a scarcity of energy resources right now, and that scarcity is likely to continue for some years to come.

The mandatory allocation of fuel oil and propane announced recently by the Administration should make believers out of many people who previously were skeptical about the extent of the energy crisis. This was not an action taken lightly, for it may be a forerunner of similar actions in the future.

The question arises in some conversations - - why now? It seems as though we are faced with this crisis all of a sudden, and the proposed cures seem awfully drastic for something that came on so quickly.

But the problem did not just happen suddenly. There were predictions ten years ago that the United States would become dependent on foreign oil by the mid-70s. Those predictions were wrong to the extent that they failed to gauge our oil consumption correctly and we came face to face with the crisis early in the 70s rather than in the mid-70s. But, although they failed to show just how much more oil Americans would be using, they correctly showed that the problem was brewing.

Did we listen? Not very carefully, because we used more and more petroleum every year, and then added to the problem by starting an anti-pollution crusade that used even more of our energy resources.

We are all aware that the new cars with all their anti-pollution equipment use more gas. But maybe not enough of us realize that industry in many cases has had to switch from burning coal to burning oil to meet pollution standards. This, too, has led to drastically increased petroleum consumption.

Then, there has been the additional problem of environmental considerations holding up or stopping completely attempts to develop new energy sources. The Alaska pipeline controversy is a good example in this regard.

The pipeline will give us far greater oil reserves to tap, but that is not a whole answer either. With present technology we can only recover 30-35 percent of our available reserves, and then only at a rate of one-eighth of that 30-35 percent each year. To try to pump more would result in leaving vast pockets of oil behind, something that we obviously cannot afford to do.

Short-term solutions are not at all satisfactory. We must make certain that Americans get through the winter without cold homes. We want to do that without jeopardizing the steps taken toward dealing with our environmental problems. But, it seems apparent that these two things won't be easily reconciled. If we want warm homes, we may have to put up with somewhat dirtier air for a time, or vice versa.

The long-term solutions are a little more encouraging. There is plenty of coal available if we can find a way to use it without causing a lot of pollution. Some initial experiments provide hope that coal can be made into a clean fuel. Other energy sources are also being looked at, and in another decade the energy crisis should be well behind us. But for now, we had better realize that we no longer have unlimited energy supplies available.
