

As students crowd around for a closer look, Dr. Herr explains the meaning of ear tags on sheep (above). Sixth-grade teacher Ed Harris, below, a self-confessed city slicker, was pretty good with the shears but said he wasn't ready to give up teaching just yet for the life of a professional sheep shearer. One of Harris' pupils, Patty Hackett, Denver RD1, looks on to observe his technique.

Removing Stains

To effectively remove stains without damaging the fabric:

— Identify the cause of the stain. Most stains fall into one of the three classifications—greasy, nongreasy, or a combination of the two.

— Baste an "X" with white thread near the spot on the right side of the garment. This marks the stain and allows you to work on the stain from the underside of the garment.

— Place a special padding of folded paper towels or old turkish towel on the ironing board to absorb the residue of the stain from the garment. After each application of clear water, solvent or detergent and water solution, move or change the padding so a clean area absorbs the remaining stain.

— Turn the right side of the garment face down against the padding on ironing board. Be sure the wrong side of the fabric is the side on which you are working so that the stain will be washed out of the fabric, not through it.

— Use a toothbrush or a piece of cloth as an applicator. Rub lightly from the center of the spot and "feather" outward. An eye dropper is also an effective applicator because it keeps the spot from spreading.

— Repeat the treatment as long as any stain or residue appears on the padding.

— Never allow the treated area to remain wet. Stroke the garment gently on the wrong side until it is dry. Drying the fabric helps eliminate rings, spot shrinkage and felting.

— When you can't identify a stain or your home procedure is impractical, consult a professional drycleaner. He has the skill, the special equipment and the chemicals to handle many of the more difficult stain problems.
