Grapes

costs anywhere from $2000 to $2500 an acre to start, but it doesn't take too long to recoup the investment."

Booming wine sales in the U.S. have lent strength to the grape market, and have lured land owners and investors into vineyard operations. Wood expects the growth in wine sales to continue, although possibly at a slower rate than is the past few years. He sees a rosy future ahead for good growers, especially in Pennsylvania where the Limited Wineries Act of 1969 has created a favorable environment for the state's win industry and vintners.

There are three basic kinds of grapes grown in the state. Most of the acreage in Erie County, and therefore the state, is planted to so-called native American grapes such as the Delaware, Niagara and Concord. These are the sweet grapes used for eating, jams, jellies and juice. Native grapes are very hardy. Vinifera, of which there are very few acres in the state, are the European grapes used in the production of fine French and California wines. Vinifera are ordinarily not thought to be very well suited to Pennsylvania's climate, but some are grown. In Erie County, farmers with Vinifera grapes are looking forward to receiving $700 to $800 a ton for their grapes.

Wood has so far planted 30 acres of French hybrids, which are hardier than Vinifera, and which also makes good wine. They are not ordinarily used for eating. And most of the new acreage being planted is going into French hybrid production.

One of the first to grow the French hybrids was Tom Hampton, Holtwood R1. He planted his four-and-a-half acres some seven years ago, and he said this year's crop is the very best he's seen yet. He expects to start picking shortly, and said this year he hopes to try a pick-your-own scheme for amateur winemakers.

Hampton sells about half his output to the amateur winemakers, and the other half to commercial wineries. He's also very optimistic about the future of local vineyards, and noted that the price for grapes this year was up about a third over last year.

Mrs. John Housekeeper, Christiansa R1, said she expects a bumper crop from her five-and-a-half acres, too. In York County, John Germick, Red Lion, said he's looking for a good crop, too. Germick grows the native varieties, rather than the French hybrids, and has one of the oldest commercial vineyards in the country.

Arnold Lueck, Lancaster County Associate Agent, said he's very impressed with this year's grape crop and with the industry in general in this area. "The growth here has been phenomenal," he said Thursday morning. "We discovered that we had the soil and the climate to grow wine grapes in this county and the industry has really taken off."
