building. "The whole thing cost about $3.25 for each bird," he said. "We've got the birds nine to a cage. Negative pressure ventilation keeps the climate always the same. We have alarm systems rigged up to let us know if the current goes off or if the heat goes haywire, or if the water pressure drops. The alarms go off in the chicken house, and they're also hooked up to a neighbor's telephone."

The cages are stacked three-high, and just as the eggs are conveyed automatically to the packer, manure is conveyed to a 40-foot-long pit that underlies one end of the house. "We have storage capacity in the pit for a four-month supply," Hershey said. "When we're ready to empty it out, we sell the manure to a neighboring farmer for fertilizer."

Norma and David Frey live on a Millersville RD1 farm adjoining the Hershey operation.

Stretching almost to a vanishing point, Norma Frey's 50,000 charges produce as many as 40,000 eggs a day. And Norma runs the operation all by herself.

Checking the water meters is one way Norma Frey keeps tabs on the 50,000 chickens in her care. If problems show up here, Norma sees that they're taken care of.
