Plaster and Clover Like Man & Wife

Early farmers had unique, catchy sayings to describe their better farming practices designed to improve crop yields

Take hay as an example

Many years ago, a farmer in Amherst County, Va. had this to say about one practice he followed in growing hay.

"Clover and plaster, like man and wife, ought never to be divorced"

This picturesque description actually referred to the long recognized practice of liming acidic soil to improve yields of grasses and other forages.

Centuries later today, liming is still recognized as a basic need in any good forage production program.

In fact, liming is listed as one of the top agricultural practices needed in farming today by Sperry New Holland, a leading manufacturer of haying and other forage equipment

As that early Virginia planter intimated in his reference to plaster, few, if any, investments provide a greater per dollar return than sweetening acidic soil with limestone

But the growing of better grasses to improve hay yields is only part of the story of more efficient haying, which has been an integral part of the history of U.S. agricultural since its Colonial beginnings. The other major improvement has been the building of better handling equipment, which has made haying a one-man farming operation

Whether it's a baler used with a thrower or automatic bale wagon, one man operating modern machinery can handle many tons of hay in a single day

If that Virginia farmer were still growing hay today, he might further paraphrase his original saying

Clover and modern machinery, like man and wife, ought never to be divorced
