Packing lunches can be easy

Although some airlines offer hot and cold beverages for sale on board, you may want to bring hot soup or other hot dishes. When brought to a boil, soup is too hot for bacteria, but if left to become lukewarm it is an excellent place for bacteria to grow. Therefore, it is important to keep the soup piping hot in a thoroughly clean, insulated thermos bottle.

If you don't want to complicate your travel with a thermos or lunch pail, there are alternatives. You might try freezing certain types of sandwiches, though you may experience some loss of quality. Frozen sandwiches thaw in time for lunch, yet spread their coolness to other foods. Frozen, foil-wrapped turkey or chicken make a welcome change from sandwiches. Hard cooked eggs, with the shell left intact to preserve the natural sterility of the eggs, are good too.

Whenever refrigeration isn't available, it is important to give extra consideration to foods for portable lunches. Canned foods are excellent - if the can is properly sealed and is not dented or bulging. Dry meats like salami and pepperoni, and fully cooked products like bologna keep well too. Clean, well washed fruits and vegetables help provide balanced nutrition. Just remember the three basic guides, HOT, COLD, CLEAN, and then enjoy a "safe" brown bag lunch... and a healthy vacation.
