Why is it that those nasty horses can always tell the difference from when I'm calling them to come and eat to when I'm calling them to ride?

If I just walk out to the barn with the intention of feeding them, they can be at the furthest point of the 20 acre pasture, but before I'm safely inside the feedroom, they're well on their way to thundering into the barn. And if I'm the least bit slow, they let me know that in no uncertain terms they want their feed and they want it now!

But, if I walk out to the barn with the intention of going riding, those same crazy beasts ignore me. I can call them until I'm blue in the face, bang on the feed chest, and rattle the bucket, but they're blind and deaf to my endeavors. If they move at all, it's further out in the pasture.

As a result, I usually end up going for a little hike before I have my ride. With halter and leadrope firmly in hand, I trudge out through the creek and up the hills to where the horses are watching and waiting.

Finally, when I'm about 10 feet away from them they make their move. Suddenly, it's stampede time, as they gallop past me and head in towards the barn. If you chase them they just run the faster. The smartest move is to wait until they're showing off, and just stand there watching them.

Usually, if they're not chased, the game loses interest for them and they allow themselves to be caught in the barnyard. However, there are occasions when I have traipsed back and fourth over the pasture from end to end no less than five times before the horses decide enough running is enough.

Those are some of the times I wonder why I like horses.
