I've discovered a new game—pothole dodging.

It seems that every time the "trusty musty" and I take to the roads there appears before us an endless trail of those sinister inverted bumps just waiting to get us. All those back country roads have them, they have grown faster over the Winter season than weeds sprout in the Summer.

I am fast becoming an expert at zigzagging back and forth across the macadem looking for spots longer than three feet without the dreaded pits that wait patiently for my tires.

Part of the problem is that I am usually driving five miles too fast for I'm about five minutes late for wherever I want to be. This makes quick reflexes and good eyesight an absolute must to win the game of "miss the potholes." Unfortunately for me, I sometimes get blinded by the sun, and any of my friends will happily inform you that my reflexes are not known for their speedy response.

Score is kept on the game. For every pothole you miss, you get one point. For every one you crash through, the road scores a point. Any pothole that you have to go off the road and onto the shoulder for doesn't count. That's cheating.

An alert player has to watch for suspicious looking puddles. Some of these "wet spots" may be 18 feet deep. Also he should be prepared for booby traps around blind corners. These are spots where the road can score many points.

If a pothole swallows your car and you come to a jarring halt, you automatically forfeit the game (and your car!) Don't be a poor loser. Get out and start hiking.

You probably know your local National Central manager. He's a neighbor, a friend. And when you need his help, he's willing to come to you. If it's more convenient, complex is a utility room and office. Landis also had a separate 60 by 175 foot machinery area and shop constructed.

On the whole, he is pleased with his new buildings and system, and offers a word of advice to other farmers.

"If you could, it would be wise to plan ahead for the future so, in case something like this happens you would have some idea what you wanted," he reflects. He does note, however, that it is difficult to plan ahead because if the farmer doesn't keep up with current trends, he won't have the latest, up-to-date system.

"But, that feeling sure was shaky. We think we made the right decisions now. We're in debt a little more, but we think it turned out all right," he concludes optimistically.
