Hog industry

Dr. David Ingraham, chief of the Bureau of Animal Industries in Harrisburg, says that Secretary of Agriculture Kent Shelhamer is very much concerned about the situation and is "very anxious to assist in the program." The Bureau of Animal Industries is coordinating the development of identification and eventually eradication programs, Ingraham says.

In the letters sent to livestock markets earlier this month, Ingraham said: "As you know, a significant number of market swine are showing lesions of swine tuberculosis ... the only way the Bureau of Animal Industries can identify producers is to have each lot of market swine identified by slap tattoos when they arrive at your markets."

The BAI is hopeful of cooperation in the identification program, emphasizing that control of the situation hinges on that fact.

Meanwhile, all hog producers are urged to consider the following precautionary measures:

What can you do to protect your herd? Don't allow poultry of any kind to come in contact with hogs. Keep poultry penned. Don't feed dead poultry, poultry entrails, or poultry litter to hogs. Incinerate dead birds or bury them at least 18 inches deep. Don't use poultry buildings or equipment for swine unless such facilities have been properly cleaned and disinfected. Don't spread poultry litter on fields that are to be used as pasture for hogs or other animals.

Do routinely disinfect swine houses, feeding floors, and similar areas with effective disinfectants. Do protect swine waterers, feed, and feeders from contamination by poultry and wild birds. Do keep wild birds away from swine.

Tuberculosis has been found in crows, starlings, blue jays, pheasants, ducks, and other wild birds.

Should your hogs become infected with tuberculosis, you can help further by cooperating with state or federal veterinarians who visit your farm. They are well qualified to advise you about the disease and methods for eradicating it.

Although cattle have been known to get TB from hogs, it is not a big concern.
