Ribbon-making involves handwork

which sews in circles stitches the material securely onto its backing.

The center buttons are placed on the pleated ribbon next. First they have to go through a laminating machine which gives them a protective coating. Then they are cut out one at a time, and finally they have a metal backing placed on them.

The buttons are now ready to be matched with the ribbon part of the rosette. They are attached by hand with a series of little metal clips which firmly hold them together.

Next the streamers are added. First they must have the information needed about the prize stamped on them and then they are cut to size. They are counted out, the ends fishtailed cut, and then a series of three staple guns which work as one unit fasten the streamers onto the rosette head.

Sally Shreiner, ribbon supervisor, related that the ribbons are checked throughout the process of being made, and a final check is again made before the order is sent out.

From there the ribbons travel to their destination to be awarded to some lucky person in some event.

So, the next time you are in the winner's circle and receive that brightly colored piece of satin, take a moment to look at the detailed work that goes into making it an item to be prized. Ribbons won are a symbol of hard work and endeavor, and when awarded, bring a smile to their winner.

The finished product, ready to be awarded to the lucky person awaits to travel to its destination.
