

Grain storage program modified

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Department of Agriculture has changed its formula for determining eligibility of farmers to continue earning storage on any commodity in a "release status" from the farmer-owned grain reserve program, according to Ray Fitzgerald, administrator of USDA's Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS).

Release from the grain reserve is authorized when the national average market price for feed grains is at least 125 per cent of the current national loan rate and at least 140 per cent for wheat. In this case, the grain is said to be in "release status."

Under previous rules, if the national average market price for a commodity stayed above the release level through the following month, storage earning stopped for all producers storing their commodity in the grain reserve.

Under the new formula, a crop's national loan rate will be subtracted from its release level and the difference added to each state loan rate. If the resulting figure is greater than the WESTMINSTER, Md. — Furman E. Hendrix, Inc. of White Hall, Md., manufacturer of Mopro Liquid Protein feeds; purchased the reserve champion crossbred steer at the Carroll County 4-H and FFA Far Livestock Sale, here, Friday, August 4th. published USDA mid-month report of "prices received by farmers, by state," storage earnings will continue for farmers in that state. This will allow all the commodity in the reserve to be in a "release status" but farmers in states where prices are low will continue to earn storage payments.

The commodity will remain in a release status in all states if the national average price is above the national release price.

The wide range in prices received by farmers in different areas of the country can create inequities to farmers participating in the reserve program, Fitzgerald said.

Very high prices in one area, as evidenced by June barley prices, can trigger release from the reserve on a national basis while prices in another area are substantially below the release level.

On July 5, USDA announced that the release level had been reached for barley in the grain reserve, enabling farmers to redeem their barley from the reserve and to sell or store it as they wish. If the average barley price continues above the release level as of July 31, USDA will keep the release authorization in effect, but farmers in some states may continue earning storage payments.
