whether the Aragonite is soluble and reactive enough to work well as an agricultural lime.

Under Dr. Teel's tutelage,

Gifford is now conducting field tests with Aragonite on his corn plots. Results must wait until after the soil and leaf analyses have been completed this Fall.

Why has Brian Gifford chosen to stick to such a demanding, risky operation? He likes the freedom to make his own decisions for one thing. If he wants to try something a little different on an acre or two, the choice is his own.

He enjoys the animals, too, and the open spaces. And he has a special fondness for the big machines, much like the ones he grew up around in the contracting business.

In fact, as a farmer Gifford looks forward to the freedom to do some contracting work too. He figures there will be some time in the Summer between planting and harvesting when the corn will be growing with or without his constant attention. Happily, that coincides with peak contracting season. The only conflict he anticipates is with haying, which he feels he can handle with the assistance of a hired worker or two.

Brian Gifford has one more important reason for sticking with farming: He's already in so deeply it would be difficult for him to get out. Like so many young farmers, he's saddled with mortgages and loans, and he has lots of expensive machinery that could be difficult to sell.

But, in five or six years most of the debts will be paid, and it should be smooth sailing after that. At least, that's the risk Brian Gifford is willing to take.

admonition and regarded it is an "old wives' tale." As a matter of fact, there is an excellent reason for staying out of the bean patch during rainy weather, says Bob Schutzki, Hunterdon County agricultural agent.

Bean rust is a fungus disease which appears on the leaves and pods as reddish-brown spots which eventually may turn black. The spores which perpetuate the disease can be spread through a bean planting by people or animals brushing against the plants when they are wet. So wait until the dew dries off before picking beans and stay out of the bean planting during rainy periods.

Incidentally, you should use the name "snap" in place of "string" when referring to modern-day beans. Plant breeders in the universities, the U.S. Department of Agriculture, and seed companies have produced varieties which do not have the tough "string" of the old days.
