

Six year old banjo player to appear

LANCASTER — Lewis Phillips is a banjo player that gets around.

While the youngster is only six years old, he already has been the participant of a TV special, which included meeting and acting with Carol Burnett and Dolly Parton.

It seems that the producers of the special were looking for a young banjo player for a special part on the show. They heard of young Phillips, whose mother, Janis, is part of the Lewis Family gospel-bluegrass music singers, and asked if he could appear.

For the special show, Lewis had to learn a new song written especially for the show, called "No one picks like a Nashville picker picks". The youngster is said to have gotten the tune right to very first time he tried it.

Lewis will be seen on the show, which airs on the CBS network on February 14, in a segment featuring both Carol Burnett and Dolly Parton. In the sketch, Dolly is on stage playing her guitar, when out comes Carol carrying a large guitar case. When she opens the case, she pulls out a small banjo. The banjo belongs to Lewis.

In the skit, Carol wanders over to the edge of the stage with the banjo, where young Lewis is standing nearby, looking up at her. She asks if he wants to try to play the banjo and he nods his head.

Lewis Phillips, six year old banjo player, who is appearing on a television special next week, will soon be travelling to the Lancaster County area where he will perform.
